AN ANNIVERSARY YEAR

This year—we hope no one tires of hearing—marks the 75th anniversary of our library building. We've been flipping through scrapbooks the last few weeks reminiscing and marveling at the changes that have occurred in a building that, seen from the street, presents itself pretty much the same as it did three score and fifteen years ago. The photos below show the inside as it appeared on Opening Day (except of course people back then did see things in color).

The sleek and modern front desk welcomed patrons underneath classic chandeliers. We'd be lying if we said we're not tempted to bring those back. The tables in the photo to the right are the same ones on our main floor today, albeit refurbished with electrical outlets and lamps. The note above the map stand provides further confirmation that librarians are loathe to rid themselves of useful things. The children's area photo comes from a profile of the Library in a 1954 library industry journal. The photo's original caption described the space as "reflecting good taste and practicality," which we're sure you'll agree could also describe your average librarian. Be on the lookout all year for more fun tidbits on our wonderful library!
